Dr Suraj Baliga, Co-Founder of Clinikk Healthcare said, "COVID-19, the coronavirus disease, is a serious illness that poses a grave threat to public health. The ease with which it transfers between individuals has seen it rapidly spread across the world, and infect approximately 150,000 people in over 150 countries at present. As such, Clinikk Healthcare has chosen a course of proactive action in the face of this global health crisis. Through our newly launched plan, we offer both individuals and organisations a comprehensive package designed to handle every aspect of treatment in the event of infection. Additionally, we've also opened our teleconsultation lines to the public for free. This step will allow individuals to have their questions on the disease be answered by qualified professionals, allaying the stress placed on India's public health system and reducing the spread of misinformation."

In addition to these efforts, Clinikk has also taken steps to enhance its existing services by opening its teleconsultation channels to the general public for free. This move will allow concerned individuals to interface directly with qualified doctors for any questions they may have on coronavirus, including its symptoms, precautionary measures to take, and screening procedures.
