

Silicon Valley Bank provides COVID-19 essentials worth Rs 2 Cr to hospitals

22 July 2021 | News

Backs COVID-19 relief efforts in India

Silicon Valley Bank (SVB), a subsidiary of SVB Financial Group and a US-based innovation economy bank, has come forward with support to COVID-19 relief efforts in India. Over the last few months, SVB has donated oxygen plants, ventilators, ambulances, lab equipment, thermometers, oximeters and PPE kits to multiple hospitals summing up to over Rs 2 crore.

Hospitals that have been covered in this initiative include Jain Mission Trust Hospital, Rakalakshmi Hospital, Nimhans, St Marthas Hospital, St. Philomena's Hospital and Gudalur Tribal Hospital.

Commenting on this initiative, Dimple Martin, Associate Director - Workplaces Services and CSR Lead, India says, "Several hospitals treating COVID-19 patients in the country had been pushed to the edge due to an acute shortage of medical supplies. We tried to support our frontline workers to continue the fight against the COVID-19 virus by providing essential supplies, as and when they needed them. This not only ensured that patients get treated on time but also reduced potential risk to the healthcare workers. Our focus has always been on the well-being of people, and we will continue to support in the timely provision of healthcare equipment in the best manner possible."

She further adds, "While the hospital initiative is one of the efforts from SVB, the team has also been actively engaged in other relief efforts including mobilising funds to provide the necessary equipment, medication and sanitisation supplies to underprivileged sections of the society."